

GOLFERS FLOCK TO TWIN HILLS FOR INSPECTION

Oklahoma City's Fourth Golf Course Brings Praise From Everyone.

Bobby Cruikshank, Al Espinosa and Harold Long, the nationally famous golf professionals who visited and praised Twin Hills, Oklahoma City's fourth golf course last week, are not the only golfers who know a sporty course when they see one.

Hundreds of Oklahoma City's gutter-percha wallopers took advantage of the "open house," of Friday and Saturday to take their first peek at the new links Perry Maxwell is building east of the city. Without exception they all expressed delight at the prospects.

Seven Holes Finished

Seven of the eighteen holes have been completed and are ready for play, but the coming of late fall which stopped the growth of grass, prevented the completion of the others at this time.

The work of clearing the fairways and grading the greens will go right along, however, grass will be planted early in the spring and the entire course is promised by July 1.

Clubhouse Plans In Making

Architects have been working for some time on the clubhouse and their plans soon will be submitted to the members for consideration.

This building will cost something like $35,000, but will be for the convenience of golfers only, organizers of the club announcing at the outset that it was to be a club for golfers only, the entertainment features that so frequently go with golf and country clubs being eliminated in this case.
