in the season, after all membership drives are completed, Mr. Dickinson said. He and Walter Wright, also of Louisville, are the guiding minds in the formation of the body.

As the summer season advances a bridal path, tennis courts and horse-shoe courts will be added to the golf course, Mr. Dickinson said. A stable of horses will be added and enlarged as the necessity demands, he said.

The first formal meeting of members, who now number more than fifty, according to Mr. Dickinson, will be held at the clubhouse Monday night in the form of a dinner dance, at which time the organization of Jeffersonville members will take place.

The golf course was constructed three years ago by Perry Maxwell, a nationally known golf architect. It was used by the Jeffersonville Country Club through last season.

Bill Kaiser, former Cherokee pill-pounder, who went to the club last year as professional, now is located in Lexington and is manager and pro of a Golfmoor miniature course.

The membership of the Northside Country Club, according to Mr. Dickinson, will be by invitation only and will be limited. All the privileges of the sporty links, the club house and grounds will be included in memberships, he said.

Mr. Ogilvie since coming to the United States from Carmoustie, Scotland, has followed the ancient game closely and is regarded as among the best-posted men in the city on all of its many phases. He is a brother-in-law to Ernest Morris, pro at the Lexington Country Club. For several weeks last summer he acted as pro in Ernest's place at the Lexington club when the latter golfer suffered a breakdown.
